WEATHER OF CONCERN

NORTHERN CALIFORNIA

- Shower activity over the coast range and Shasta County has little activity, which has cancelled the Winter Storm Warning.
- Scattered snow showers over the Sierra Cascade range and foothills has prompted the Winter Storm Warning to remain in effect until the morning hours.
- Cold air will continue to bring down snow levels.
 - Foothills snow levels will be between 1,000 to 2,000 feet, with a potential below 1,000 feet.
- Snow may be possible in the northern Sacramento valley, in the Redding area, however impacts will be minimum.
- The upper low in the forecast area will shift into the Great Basin, which should bring a significant drop off in precipitation over the Sierra Cascade.
- Wednesday morning could see light showers, and by later Wednesday afternoon the end of precipitation.
- Thursday will see overall high temperatures.
- Friday will see light precipitation with the majority of the precipitation threat moving south of the forecast area.
 - Precipitation amounts should remain light.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA

- Showers today will result from a very cold upper low that will move just south of Sacramento.
- Not much moisture will be brought with this system as it has no other moisture sources and will not be able to produce much in the way of rainfall.
- Rainfall intensities today will not warrant concern for any flooding.
- Skies will not be as cloudy as they have previously been and will be partly to cloudy.
- Snow levels will drop between 3,000 to 3,500 feet and will fall locally to 2,000 feet across the interior.
 - The mountains today and this evening will likely see an additional 2 to 4 inches of snow fall accumulation.
 - Isolated areas could see up to 10 to 15 inches of snow fall accumulation.
- The combination of snow and strong winds will keep Winter Storm Warning and Advisories in effect.
- Patchy frost is possible in some inland valleys for tonight into early Wednesday morning.
- Wednesday will be mostly dry, except for some north slope snow showers near the Kern County Line.
 - Skies will turn partly cloudy to mostly sunny, with max temperatures approx. 3 to 6 degrees warmer.
- Friday will see an increase in cloud coverage, while max temperatures will hold steady from Thursday.
